ISEC FIRST FUND

Report of the Investment Manager

Investment Managers' Report until June 30, 2023

Investerum Global Value Fund

During the first quarter of the year, the markets were mainly characterized by concerns about the economic implications of increasing inflation. The rising long-term interest rates created an unsustainable situation for several niche banks, among others Signature Bank and Silicon Valley Bank, that did not have their risks under control. The aforementioned niche banks' businesses turned out to be based, perhaps to a slightly too large extent, on lending to non-profitable younger technology companies. A classic bank run became the final nail in the coffin for the niche banks and sealed their fates.

What will be memorable was how quickly conditions changed. On February 16th, Silicon Valley Bank was named one of America's best banks by the prestigious magazine Forbes. Less than a month later, on the tenth of March, the bank collapsed as the result of a bank run. Wiser from previous lessons from the Lehman crash, central banks around the world acted in a coordinated and prompt manner by ensuring liquidity and also forcing ownership changes. It appears that negative spillover effects from the banking crisis have been avoided.

The markets were also characterized by interest rate increases, inflation and continued strength in the stock markets. Earnings reports presented by companies were surprisingly positive. In particular reports from companies with strong brands that, through outstanding price leadership, were able to implement price increases to their customers. Another strong driving force behind the rise in equity markets was reduced inflation anxiety. During the end of the period, some sort of hype arose around companies with connections to Artificial Intelligence. Which led to considerable price increases in companies operating in the area. Most central banks raised their key interest rates several times during the period. In addition, representatives of several central banks warned that future increases are highly likely, which caused long-term interest rates to rise further.

During the period the fund has taken a position in Lannebo High Yield in order to better take advantage of the current interest rate environment.

The figures stated in the report are historical and not necessarily indicative of future performance.
